

It is well known to students of Hawthorne that the great romancer was a diligent recorder of the observations which lay at the foundation of his fiction and his sketches; that he accumulated many volumes of manuscript notes, and had recourse to this material when engaged upon the books which his observation, under an informing imagination suggested. The connection between the first notes and the final form was closest, naturally, in the case of Our Old Home which was very largely composed by Hawthorne of transcripts from his note-books, so that when his widow printed the English Note-Books she found herself compelled to omit many pages because they had already been used by the author when writing the sketches which composed Out Old Home.
